Introduction

Since the outbreak of the corruption scandal in Turkey in December 2013, Prime Minister and then President Recep Tayyip Erdogan and his government have been particularly targeting the Hizmet (Gülen) movement. According to Erdogan and his lieutenants, the alleged charges brought forward by Istanbul prosecutors on December 17 and 25, 2013, were in fact insidious attempts to topple the AKP government that were orchestrated by Hizmet sympathizers and affiliates in the Turkish state and bureaucracy, including judiciary and police forces. The Hizmet movement, which suddenly found itself on the defensive, has been vehemently denying these allegations, calling them baseless accusations serving to cover up the corruption charges. While the corruption cases were effectively rendered obsolete through a series of laws and executive interventions aimed at courts, the attacks on Hizmet continue in full force, evolving recently from rhetoric to action.

This work aims to exhibit various human rights violations, defamation, hate speech, unlawful conduct, incrimination and other misconduct perpetrated by Turkish government officials and pro-government media against the individuals and entities associated with the Hizmet movement in Turkey. Special focus on the Hizmet movement is warranted for two reasons. First, although the increasingly authoritarian AKP government is generally averse to any form of dissent and has already produced many enemies and victims across the society, the attacks on the Hizmet movement have reached a level of obsession and collective delirium that makes the situation all the more worrying. Second, the Hizmet movement, which is essentially a loosely connected network of individuals and religious, educational, and humanitarian organizations and institutions inspired by the ideas of Turkish Islamic scholar Fethullah Gulen, has a presence in many countries outside Turkey. This fact, coupled with the efforts of the Turkish government to discredit the movement in the other parts of the world, gives the issue an international dimension.

The relationship between the AKP government and the Hizmet movement in Turkey was one of amity and collaboration roughly until 2012. Hizmet supported AKP initiatives of membership in the European Union, limiting military influence in politics, and expanding rights and freedoms, largely through its media outlets such as Zaman daily and the Samanyolu broadcasting group. This relationship turned sour in the following years, after AKP leadership shifted its political vision from further democratization and a new civilian-drafted constitution to consolidation of power aimed toward an Erdogan-centered system of governance. Thus, coming to December 2013, this was also exacerbated by the Hizmet media's neutral standing during the Gezi protests and the tension brought by the prep-school debate in November 2013, and there was not much good will left between the AKP and Hizmet.

The rationale behind the decision and determination of Erdogan and the AKP government to launch an "all-out war" against the Hizmet movement in particular is still debated. Given the past collaboration and conservative credentials of the movement, this decision looked too risky to take right before critical elections, even for a masterful politician like Erdogan. But, retroactively speaking, this move made sense in terms not only of the sour relations described above, but also the contradictions between the views of the AKP and Hizmet. AKP leadership had previously been drawn from a political Islamist past; but they largely appear to have abandoned this view in favor of a “Muslim democratic” view prior to their first election victory in 2002. In the last two years, however, political Islamist discourses have resurfaced, though in a rather populist and watered down fashion, blended with neo-Ottomanism. An effort also emerged to present the AKP as the true refuge of the religious and Erdogan as the leader of all Muslims. Hizmet, on the other hand, subscribes to a more “moderate” and at times quite progressive interpretation of Islam that is comfortable with ideas of democracy, universal human rights, and interfaith dialogue. Thus, the recent ideological shift of the AKP did not leave any room to accommodate a view such as that of the Hizmet movement for ideological and political/practical purposes. On the contrary, the ruling party and its leaders attempted to portray Hizmet as a “non-Islamic, foreign-led” adversary that “needs to be outlawed and eliminated.”

The clash between the AKP government and the Hizmet movement was initially portrayed as a “power struggle,” “a tug of war,” between the two by some domestic and international observers. The secular segments of the Turkish society were also hesitant to take part in the clash, due to the past friendship between the AKP and Hizmet. In the meantime, taking advantage of the confusion, the AKP government passed a series of laws in the guise of fighting the “parallel structure” in the state, but essentially revoking separation of powers and restricting the rights and freedoms of everyone. The bitter tone in the presidential election campaign, election of Erdogan as president, and ensuing developments adequately showed that the targeting of Hizmet is just an aftereffect of an overarching trajectory, namely the founding of a “new Turkey,” a new regime custom-designed by and for Erdogan with concomitant restructuring of the state apparatus. Therefore, the ongoing persecution of Hizmet in Turkey is not only a major blow to pluralism, democracy, and the idea of a progressive, globally appealing interpretation of Islam, but also a harbinger of things to come for all who dare to dissent in this new political setting.

Categories of Persecution

The information presented below is an incomplete account of the persecution to which Hizmet has been subjected in Turkey. It should be taken as a representation of what has been and is currently happening in Turkey. The Rethink Institute website features an Excel file that is regularly updated; it also includes hyperlinks to news reports that provide more details about specific incidents. Once downloaded, the file may be used to filter and edit data for various purposes.

This chronicle covers persecution of Hizmet in Turkey under five categories:

Defamation

The incidents listed under this category include hate speech, slander, libel, and vilification of the Hizmet movement, institutions, and individuals by public officials and pro-government media. This category also includes responses or refutations published or delivered by Hizmet institutions or by Fethullah Gulen himself, as well as their lawsuits against defamation. Finally, the category also features supporting statements by others against defamation of Hizmet.

Conspiracy

This category covers plots, incrimination, and other scare tactics reported in the media or sometimes announced by government officials themselves, which aim to instill fear in the movement and prepare the public for possible controversial actions.

Discrimination

This category covers denial of service, participation, and human rights by public authorities to the people, institutions, and organizations affiliated with the Hizmet movement.

Blacklisting

This category features attempts by public authorities to build lists of individuals and entities that are suspected to be related to the Hizmet movement as well as other disfavored groups. The lists that contain names of individuals are used to ostracize civil servants, and disqualify applicants to civil service at state and public agencies. The lists that contain entities, including private businesses that support Hizmet schools and institutions, are used to deny public services and benefits.

Unlawful Conduct

This category features unlawful conduct that is increasingly commonplace, especially since the presidential election in August 2014. The category includes unlawful orders, decrees that target the Hizmet movement, and actions by central as well as local government officials against individuals and entities. The category also lists some lawsuits filed by those individuals and entities, as well as criticism of such conduct by their parties.
